Dear Senators Manchin and Sinema,

As the Treasurers of our respective states, we are deeply concerned about one of the proposals contained in the “Build Back Better” spending plan – one which the citizens of our states fiercely oppose. President Joe Biden and the U.S. Treasury Department have proposed dramatically expanding Internal Revenue Service data collection practices in a manner that implicates the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution’s protections against unreasonable searches and seizures. The proposal would force banks to report citizens’ personal banking activity to the federal government when the total value of their transactions, including deposits and withdrawals, exceeds $600 per calendar year. While some lawmakers have proposed narrowing the scope of the proposal and raising the transaction threshold to $10,000, we believe that any proposal of this nature violates the Fourth Amendment and our citizens’ reasonable expectations of financial privacy.

In recent weeks, our citizens have expressed overwhelming opposition to this proposal. In fact, recent polling has indicated more than two-thirds of Americans believe this policy is a misguided governmental overreach. Additionally, banking representatives believe that this proposal will increase costs to consumers and diminish their ability to serve communities. Further, community banks have expressed concerns that the compliance regimes required to institute this reporting could be so onerous they could potentially face collapse. While the Biden Administration claims that the proposal is aimed at cracking down on wealthy tax evaders, in reality, the increased data collection practices will capture bank account information from average Americans and even many low-income individuals.

We ask you to stand up for our constituents in our respective states and to protect our people's interests and their Constitutional right to privacy and oppose this measure.

Thank you for your work and consideration on this matter.

Sincerely,
